Allen Dulles Sees Reds Baffled by Spies' Info

CPYRGHT

Special to the New York Post

Washington, Oct. 10—The Russians don't know what to do with the intelligence they collect about the U. S., according to Central Intelligence Agency Chief Allen Dulles.

The Russians are good at collecting the information, Dulles says, but "I don't think the people who analyze the intelligence they get know these other countries well enough.

"So few of them have been, say, to the U. S., that I would say that the collection is good and analysis is probably not so good."

Dulles said the "spirit of Geneva" certainly hasn't infected the Soviet intelligence operation. It's still collecting information as fast as it can.

In the field of subversion, Dulles said, there's been no relaxation whatever.

Dulles said the U. S. has a tougher time collecting information about the Russians now than it had in 1946. New barriers have been effective, he explained.
